The Rise of Public Policy in India

Over the past two decades, public policy has fundamentally changed the landscape of governance in India. With more than 60 academic programmes and a multi-billion dollar public policy industry in India today, professionals to work in the area of public policy are certainly in demand and on the rise.

These jobs range from strategic advisory, policy analysis, evaluation and monitoring of government programmes and advocating for issues in the public interest such as climate and environment advocacy, energy sufficiency, gender and human rights, and community empowerment.

Be that as it may, different public policy professional programmes offer a distinct approach to educating aspiring professionals to meet the needs of this profession.

A Distinctive Approach at NLSIU

The Master's Programme in Public Policy (MPP) at the National School of India University (NLSIU) offers one such distinctive approach. It was one of the first to launch a full-time programme in India in 2014. Our faculty come with diverse experience from both local and global academic backgrounds, including some of the founding faculty and students of NLSIU. The MPP has evolved and is at the forefront of public policy education in India today.

Join the Conversation

We invite curious, interested and aspiring students, lawyers and other professionals to this open house conversation about public policy education and practice focussing on the curriculum and pedagogy of what NLSIU has to offer in this subject.

The open house will be conducted and MPP Vice-Chair

What Makes This Programme Unique

The Master's Programme in Public Policy (MPP) provides a comprehensive education for aspiring public policy professionals to constructively meet the challenges of complex public problems.

Additionally, how governments function cannot be fully understood by only looking only at data-based evidence and socio-political contexts. Data helps to evaluate how governments act because data reflects government action. And laws help to assess how governments think. Public policy requires understanding administrative procedures, constitutional norms and a case-based understanding of how governments think and act.

Our programme comprises relevant and contemporary perspectives from the:

This programme is distinctive because it is singularly poised to provide an exemplary foundation in the law relevant to public policy.
